Paper is made of millions of tiny fibres. The fibres are cellulose, a substance from the cell walls of plants. The cellulose used in paper today comes mostly from trees. When the bark of a tree log has been stripped off, the wood is ready to be turned into pulp. Pulp is done either by grinding up the wood or by cooking it with chemicals. Some pulping methods use both grinding and cooking. The wood pulp is then screened and washed to clean out impurities and chemicals. It may be bleached to make the paper whiter, so that printing or writing shows up better on it. On the next step, the pulp is beaten in a large mixing machine and mixed with water. The beating frays the fibres, which helps them match together. Starch, clay, or other materials may be added to improve the surface of the paper for printing and writing.
